Since I habitually have restless nights, I usually picked up a book from my stack on the night stand to have a remedy to cause drowsiness. Usually reading books can help me clear my mind. Hours later at 4am, my mind was racing as I was reading of all the things I can do to create a community of advocates for my small business. This is a fantastic playbook for word of mouth that is enjoyable to read and easy to understand. It demystify this area of organic marketing for so many of us that are "traditional marketers" don't really understand. The playbook is filled with examples of what can go well and what can go wrong at every turn. No matter what size is your business, this playbook has an implementation approach that is right sized. It doesn't matter if you have big data, little data or no data. There are still options of what you can do to create an authentic experience of your brand and business. After reading this fun and entertaining book, you have the knowledge to be the architect of your own brand conversations. The playbook helps you figure out why, who, when, what and where. It makes me want to go out and take charge of the day as soon as I get some sleep.

By John Moore
FIZZ is a nice addition to my business book library. I've known Ted Wright for many years and value his perspective. His book shares the Wright way to craft a talkable brand story. The gist of FIZZ is a talkable brand story begins with great insight which fuels creative ideas but only when the story is told with an authentic voice will it connect and spread with the intended audiences. If you are in marketing, I suggest you get smarter by reading this book.
